Department of Defense (DoD) has asked the Federal Communications

Commission (FCC) for an emergency waiver to allow use of an unlicensed (i.e., “white space”) radio band to relay data across the U.S. The same radio frequencies were also used for telemedicine and Wi-Fi, further complicating efforts to reclaim the band. The FCC is working on issuing a separate document detailing how the waiver will work, but an FCC official said the agency is worried about which wireless providers will dominate the band.

“What we are trying to do is work through some of these issues of priority and who gets to use which part of the spectrum and the business model that would be presented for use in this. What you are talking about is a great amount of spectrum and a great amount of flexibility,” said FCC senior adviser for public policy for technology and competition Dayna

Berryhill at a press conference Tuesday. The FCC is also open to other ideas to address DoD's need. "I think it is fair to say we are open to ideas about what to do about other communities, what to do about other uses that have been proven to work and what are best practices," Berryhill said. This is the second time the DoD has requested an emergency waiver to use unlicensed spectrum for radio-based technology.

“There is a long list of bands where the government is using the white spaces, and they have always been used for safety and commercial purposes,” said FCC senior adviser for public policy for technology and competition Dayna Berryhill. “The bandwidth in the white spaces in the Unlicensed band has always been associated with use for communications.” The Federal Communications

Commission is working
